"Confidence isn't the problem. The rules you've inherited are."

For decades, we've told people — especially women — that hesitation, second-guessing, and self-doubt are confidence problems. Research says otherwise. What most people are navigating is a set of contradictory inherited rules. This worksheet helps you see them — and start writing your own.

◆ PART 1 — THE INHERITED RULES

From childhood onward, we absorb rules about how we should show up. List the ones you were given.

Rules about how I should behave at work:

Rules about how someone like me should speak, lead, or take up space:

Rules I absorbed about success and what it looks like:

Rules that feel contradictory — where two rules cancel each other out:

Part 2 — The Double Bind

The double bind: judged as too soft OR too tough, but never just right. Map yours.

IF I DO THIS...	I GET LABELED AS...
Speak assertively	Aggressive / too much
Speak softly	Weak / not credible
Show emotion	Too sensitive / unprofessional
Hide emotion	Cold / uncaring
Ask for what I want	Demanding / entitled
Don't ask	Passive / not ambitious

Add your own double bind — a specific situation where you can't win:

Where has navigating this double bind cost you energy, opportunity, or authenticity?

What would you do differently if the double bind didn't exist?

Part 3 — Your Self-Authored Rules

Now replace the inherited rules with ones you actually choose. Not rules that will make everyone comfortable — yours.

THE RULE I'M RETIRING — IT NO LONGER SERVES ME:

THE RULE I'M WRITING TO REPLACE IT:

HOW I WANT TO SHOW UP — ON MY OWN TERMS:

THE VERSION OF CONFIDENT THAT LOOKS LIKE ME (NOT ANYONE ELSE):

ONE SITUATION THIS WEEK WHERE I'LL APPLY MY OWN RULE INSTEAD:
